MANASSEH CHORUS (Clock Tower X): A FARA-Registered, Israel-Funded Influencer Operation Aimed at the American Right

From TIME's investigation (13 July 2026) and the FARA filings it reviewed

BOTTOM LINE UP FRONT

TIME reported on 13 July 2026, from FARA filings it reviewed, that the agency Havas hired Brad Parscale's firm Clock Tower X in September 2025 to run a digital campaign for the State of Israel. The agreement calls for at least 100 content pieces a month, most aimed at Gen Z on TikTok, Instagram, YouTube, and podcasts; at least 50 million monthly impressions; amplification through social media and Salem Media Network channels; and an effort to shape how ChatGPT, Claude, and Gemini characterize Israel and the war. Israel pays $1.5 million a month. The public framing was combating online antisemitism; an Israeli Foreign Ministry official said the aim was to keep young conservatives from turning against Israel.

Aunoo tracks this as MANASSEH CHORUS, assessing that it combined a disclosed, FARA-registered contract with allegedly undisclosed downstream amplification. TIME reported, citing three people familiar with the campaign, that a network of Parscale firms (Clock Tower X, Campaign Nucleus, Influenceable) fed conservative influencers suggested language through private group chats and compensated them by reach, producing what looks like an organic conversation. Parscale confirms the campaign and its goal, denies undermining President Trump, and says the FARA-registered money did not pay influencers.

What is documented

Under the September 2025 FARA agreement, Clock Tower X is to produce 100 original pieces of content a month, at least 80 percent aimed at Gen Z, amplify them across social media and, per a draft Services Agreement, through Salem Media Network properties, deliver at least 50 million monthly impressions, and work to shape how ChatGPT, Claude, and Gemini characterize Israel. Brad Parscale ran Trump's 2016 digital operation and 2020 campaign; TIME reports he has not spoken to Trump in more than five years. The mechanism, per three sources, distributes suggested language to conservative influencers through private group chats and pays by impressions and engagement; Clock Tower X's own site advertises an "influencer ecosystem" that amplifies narratives "through credible, distributed voices." TIME reviewed one Influenceable pay structure of $2,250 base plus $1 per 1,000 views up to two million. The operation also built websites (PaxPoint.org, FactSignal.org) reported to be designed for AI systems to ingest rather than for human readers.

Why this matters

Foreign influence on the President's base. A foreign government is paying an American operator to shape the views of the U.S. President's own political movement, reaching audiences through influencers who present as independent voices.

Targeting the AI layer. The contract specifies an effort to shape how ChatGPT, Claude, and Gemini describe Israel, and the operation built sites intended for those systems to ingest rather than for human readers. It is one of the most unusual documented deliverables in the filing and a rare on-record example of influence work aimed at the AI information layer.

Disclosed contract, undisclosed amplification. A registered FARA contract sits alongside allegedly undisclosed downstream amplification. If borne out, that combination is harder to police than either a clearly covert network or a labeled advertisement.

ASSESSMENT

The existence, sponsor, price, and deliverables of the operation, including the AI-targeting clause, are well supported by TIME's review of the FARA filings and Parscale's confirmation. The paid-influencer mechanism is moderately supported (three anonymous sources plus marketing language and a prior example). The claim that it worked against Trump's ceasefire is contested. Confidence: high on the contract and deliverables; moderate on amplification effect; low on the disputed anti-Trump effect.

Outlook and indicators to watch

- Documentation of amplification. Whether filings or reporting name the specific influencers and payments, moving the claim beyond anonymous sourcing.
- Regulatory interest. Whether U.S. authorities examine undisclosed domestic amplification of foreign-funded messaging.
- Provider response. Whether OpenAI, Anthropic, or Google respond to the documented AI-targeting and the AI-seeding sites.
- Relationship status. Whether the Israel–Parscale arrangement continues given reported Israeli frustration.

Source assessment and confidence

The report rests on a single principal investigation by TIME, anchored on FARA filings it reviewed (not independently obtained by Aunoo); TIME plus the filings it reviewed is effectively one investigation drawing on primary documents, not two independent reviews. VP Vance's 15 July remarks, reported by The Independent and others, corroborate the political dispute but not the payment mechanism. The contract terms are documented; the influencer-payment mechanism is sourced to three people familiar with the campaign plus a prior visible example; the anti-Trump effect is contested. Because independent corroboration of the mechanism is still absent, the actor profile is held below the repository's publish bar.

Confidence: high on the existence, sponsor, price, and deliverables, including the AI-targeting clause; moderate on the reach and effect of the amplification; low on the disputed anti-Trump effect.
